This article is one of a series of short essays, collectively titled “Further Explorations,” published as part of a special issue of Oral Tradition in honor of John Miles Foley’s 65th birthday and 2011 retirement. The surprise Festschrift, guest-edited by Lori and Scott Garner entirely without his knowledge, celebrates John’s tremendous impact on studies in oral tradition through a series of essays contributed by his students from the University of Missouri-Columbia (1979-present) and from NEH Summer Seminars that he has directed (1987-1996).

http://journal.oraltradition.org/issues/26ii

Volume 26, Number 2 October, 2011
Upon an introductory visit, one might be fooled into making the assumption that the wind-ravaged fields, rock-strewn paths, quiet whitewashed villages, and backcountry roads of the Conamara region in the west of Ireland share those archetypal characteristics so many of us still ascribe to all things rural: isolated, uninfluenced by the modern world, lagging behind in technology, and richly endowed with folklore. After all, this sort of tropology is a cornerstone upon which many cultural tourism initiatives continue to be based. But these tropes are certainly as old as rurality itself, for it is a common facet of the human imagination to define the unknown or the remote as that which is “beyond the pale.” Indeed, the fields of anthropology and folklore were built around the perceived need for salvage ethnography of such places, documenting and classifying a community and its intangible cultural heritage before its inevitable disappearance or decline at the hands of modernity. But even though the effects of this dark history can still be seen in academe, where the topic of folk music, for example, continues to conjure images of unchanging musicians performing an ancient and static repertoire, as researchers we no longer spend volumes seeking simply to invert these wrongs of the past, for we understand that, as with all great generalizations, they are quickly unraveled by knowledge and experience. Instead, we seek to provide nuanced understanding of specific times in specific places, informed by systems of knowledge unique to those places. Conamara (anglicized to Connemara), the gaeltacht (Irish-speaking district) in the west of the Irish Republic spread out beyond the cosmopolitan Gaillimh (Galway City), is a place that never stops moving; it is a place that has always been connected with travel and technology via maritime trade and is populated today by a mobile and well-traveled people; it is a place with a bilingual and highly technologically literate population where, for many, oral systems of knowledge continue to organize time and memory; it is a culture that looks outward toward the sea.

I spent two years in Conamara living, working, and doing fieldwork on different musical traditions and their roles in community development initiatives in the region. In this short piece, I am concerned not so much with detailing the specifics of sean-nós, the orally transmitted, unaccompanied, highly ornamented musical tradition sung as Gaeilge (in Irish) I studied there, as much as I am with using it to help provide an introduction to the topic of people employing the newest forms of technology to find ways to dynamically continue and interact with the oldest forms of technology—in this case, their oral traditions.\(^2\) Sean-nós continues to be a criminally understudied oral tradition, though newer academic work by Shields (1985), O’Rourke (1987, 1990), Mac Aodha (1996), Ó Madagáin (2005), Ó Laoire (2004, 2007), and a number of others has been particularly helpful in illuminating this fascinating genre. Studies that treat the use of digital technology in preserving, continuing, infrastructurally employing, and critically interacting with sean-nós—even in terms of its more straightforward use in Irish language maintenance and continuation\(^3\)—have thus far been virtually nonexistent.\(^4\) Therefore, I provide here a survey of sorts, detailing a number of programs and organizations in Conamara that are using digital media technology to enhance, continue, and further sean-nós, with the hope that discussions such as these inspire further work in the field. The primarily oral culture of traditional Conamara is in a constant state of change, just as sean-nós is no longer a primarily rural, native Gaeilge-speaking tradition. Studies that treat these fluidities and complexities of tradition both as they exist today and in their historical context will necessarily provide our methodological roadmaps for future writing and thought.

The west of Ireland is home to several gaeltacht that exist as small geographic areas largely within the counties of Donegal, Galway, and Kerry.\(^5\) The Conamara gaeltacht in Co. na Gaillimhe (Co. Galway) is the largest of the gaeltachts and therefore serves as the unofficial sociolinguistic and cultural center for speakers of Irish. The main all-Irish radio station, Raidió na Gaeltachta (http://www.rte.ie/rnag/), and Irish-language television station, TG4 (http://www.tg4.ie/), are both located here. Of the importance and centrality of sean-nós to Conamara work and life, Johnny Mháirtín Learaí MacDonncha,\(^6\) a senior singer from the small village of Leitir Ard, tells me that while learning to sing sean-nós is a personal journey of lifelong apprenticeship, learning, and experience, it is most importantly a way for people to meet, remember, and think about the place they live (MacDonncha 2005).\(^7\) Josie Sheáin Jack \(^3\) The Republic of Ireland has seen massive changes in Irish language usage, preservation schemes, teaching techniques, and trends over the last century. While all public school children now receive Irish language training in primary school, Ireland’s percentage of native speakers is usually estimated at around three to five percent.

\(^5\) Though the borders of the gaeltachts are well-defined in maps of the area, these geographical delineations were manufactured and defined by non-Irish speakers and thus belie colonial legacy more than socio-geographic reality.

\(^6\) A performance by Johnny Mháirtín Learaí MacDonncha can be found at http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ATkwFesWEzE/.

\(^7\) All personal interviews included in this essay were conducted, recorded, and transcribed by the author in Conamara in 2004 and 2005.
MacDonnchadha, a contemporary of Johnny Mhairtin Learai’s from the village of Carna, tells me in English that (MacDonnchadha 2005):

Sean-nós can be learned but it’s usually better if there’s someone teaching that there’s a tradition behind it. It doesn’t really have to be in the family, but it’s better if it is, because of all the recordings, the BBC and Séamus Ennis recordings, too, many learn from tape recorders or CDs now. Sean-nós is important for how people think of their culture. I’d say . . . 90% of people think that way. Sean-nós is being put in front of people more than it has before, with RnaG [Raidió na Gaeltachta] and others. . . .

Caitríona Ní Bhaoill, the marketing director for Cló Iar-Chonnachta, the Conamara-based Irish-language music and book publishing company (http://www.cic.ie/), says “there is a huge resurgence in young people in music in Conamara . . . and it’s most obvious in the popularity of sean-nós” (Ní Bhaoill 2004). Some sean-nós singers, like the young Áine Ní Dhroighneáin from the village of An Spidéal, a few miles outside of Galway City, tell me that sean-nós is merely a facet of the Irish language, and that as one is threatened, so is the other (Ní Dhroighneáin 2005). Nearly all of those with whom I spoke said that Raidió na Gaeltachta, TG4 (the all-Irish television station), and the University of Ireland-Galway and its extension centers in the gaeltachts are of importance in helping to maintain and support sean-nós performers and their art.

The success in the use of digital media technology in preserving, maintaining, and, most importantly, critically interacting with sean-nós in Conamara is a testament to the ways in which, to reference indigenous art and media scholar Eric Michaels (1994:84), there is sometimes something essential to cultural maintenance associated with not writing, where digital media “works” where the written word cannot. In fact, scholars such as John Miles Foley have taken these ideas even further to provide in-depth studies of the striking similarities and correspondences between oral traditions and the Internet. The Gael Acadamh, a locally-run development organization based in the unofficial Conamara “hub” village of An Spidéal, features Irish-language classes and apprenticeships in sean-nós singing and dance and has seen multiple videographers using film to document Irish oral traditions graduate from its site, including the well-known sean-nós dancer, Seosamh (Joe) Ó Neachtain. The Indreabhán (Inverin)-based publishing company Cló Iar-Chonnachta records sean-nós singers not only in order to commercially release, preserve, and market their work locally and internationally, but also to increase their accessibility in a sort of digital community of locals, researchers, and other performers. And Raidió na Gaeltachta, the all-Irish gaeltacht-based radio station, is concerned with digital preservation, radio programming, and broadcasting of sean-nós not only to the people of Conamara and the other gaeltachts but throughout the world via online streaming.

---

8 Josie Sheain Jack MacDonnchadha can be viewed performing at http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AbeUwSyKvQs.

9 The Pathways Project is one such study by John Miles Foley (2011-), available online at http://www.pathwaysproject.org/.
An hOllscoil na hÉireann, Gaillimh (the National University of Ireland-Galway) as an institution provides much support and many resources for sean-nós singers. In addition to world-class Irish language teaching both on-site and online through the Acadamh na hOllscolaiochta Gaeilge (http://www.acadamh.ie), the NUIG Irish Studies Centre supports an annual sean-nós Singer-in-Residence\textsuperscript{10}—chosen on the basis of both past accomplishments and performative knowledge—who lectures, performs, and offers support in turn to other sean-nós singers throughout the year.\textsuperscript{11}

Pléaraca Chonamara (http://www.plearaca.ie) is a community arts scheme located in the village of Ros Muc in Conamara theas (south Conamara) and supported by An Roinn Ealaion, Oidhreacht agus Gaeltachta (the Irish Department of Arts, Heritage, and Gaeltacht Affairs, whose website is available at http://www.ahg.gov.ie/en/). Each year Pléaraca Chonamara hosts a festival of music, dancing, and boating that prominently features sean-nós. One of many festivals of its kind held in Conamara,\textsuperscript{12} Pléaraca distinguishes itself first and foremost as an anti-poverty initiative and thus seeks to find job placements or living wages for the sean-nós singers, musicians, and other traditional artists that call south Conamara home. Digital filmmakers, oral historians, and storytelling enthusiasts travel great distances to attend Pléaraca, which is surprising only because of its more remote location and tiny size and budget. Work that examines the exponential proliferation of digital filmmaking in Conamara as a method of oral tradition maintenance is in great demand.

The Áras Shorcha Ní Ghuairim, an Irish-language teaching and resource facility, is located in the Conamara village of Carna and named after the well-known female sean-nós singer from the area. The center has, since its inception in 1998, offered academic programs and supported language-centered community development initiatives, with sean-nós as the center of its work (Ó Concheanainn 2005). The center offers a Certificate in Irish Folklore at the Master’s level, maintains a Folklore Preservation Program, hosts the annual Seosamh Einniú (Joe Heaney) sean-nós festival, and has conducted an ambitious project involving the digitization of the Seosamh Einniú sean-nós archives, for which local people were hired and trained in the process of digitization and online cultural preservation and curation (Ó Concheanainn 2005). This digital \textsuperscript{10} More information about the National University of Ireland-Galway Sean-nós Singer in Residence program can be found online at http://www.nuigalway.ie/centre_irish_studies/singer_in_residence.htm.

\textsuperscript{11} The Irish Studies Centre is also home to the Joe Burke Music Archive (available at http://www.nuigalway.ie/centre_irish_studies/burke_archive.htm).

\textsuperscript{12} Festivals often play a large role in cultural preservation and continuation and are therefore one of the most favored facets of both endogenous and exogenous cultural tourism initiatives. Also worthy of mention here is the Oireachtas (online at http://www.antoireachtas.ie/), a competitive music, dance, and literary festival dedicated to celebrating and promoting Irish-language cultural and artistic traditions.
Lastly, the all-Irish television station TG4 has produced a documentary film series about sean-nós called Amhráin is Ansa Líom, which airs on television but is also available online (http://www.tg4.ie/en/programmes/amhrain-is-ansa.html) along with an interactive online communication forum. Each of the 20 programs in the series features a prominent sean-nós singer speaking about the history of the tradition and their favorite songs, their influences, and the importance of maintaining local heritage, followed by a performance. Many sean-nós performers with whom I have spoken cite this series as an exciting and very popular development in the region.

Conamara, like many other economically peripheral regions within the global economy, is struggling to maintain strong culturally-based systems of knowledge and tradition in the face of increasing commodification of tradition and culture within a postcolonial/neocolonial context. But the use of digital media technologies, all the time more accessible and affordable, is providing highly effective spaces for new thought and action about cultural and community development through intangible cultural heritage maintenance. Furthering our understanding, as researchers, of the ways in which these phenomena work is therefore a critical and fascinating step ahead, and as a rhetorically flexible tradition of oral continuation/transmission of art and knowledge, sean-nós in Conamara provides an especially important mediation between history and future, continuity and rupture, and tradition and change. To adapt a concept drawn from John Miles Foley’s work (2002) for our own purposes here, it is clear that oral systems of knowledge such as sean-nós indeed function as language, only more so.

Tulane University

References

Browne 1992

Browne 1996

---

13 The program is an excellent model of rural and community development that situates its developmental policy within intangible cultural heritage. Not only is the program situated locally, which gives people who wish to remain within the gaeltacht a specific skill set and option for economic success through the development of cultural traditions, but it also provides work that is considered meaningful as a much-preferred alternative to the factory-employment system begun in the 1950s by the Irish government, and continuing through to the present (McDonagh 2005).

14 For more reading on this subject, see Gibbons et al. 2002, Lennon 2008, and Ó Laoire 2007.
Edgeworth 1833/1950

Foley 2002

Foley 2011-
_________. The Pathways Project. http://pathwaysproject.org

Gaines 1991

Gibbons et al. 2002

Gwynn 1909

Hall 1989

Lennon 2008

Leuthold 1998

Mac Aodha 1996

MacDonncha 2005

MacDonnchadh 2005

McDonagh 2005

Michaels 1994

Miller and Stam 2003

Ní Bhaoill 2004
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Author</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Publisher</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Reference</td>
<td>Description</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>