

About the Authors

Egbert Bakker prepared "Activation and Preservation" during his appointment as a fellow at the Netherlands Institute for Advanced Studies. Author of numerous articles and a monograph on ancient Greek poetry, he is presently working at the Center for Hellenic Studies in Washington D.C.

Assistant Professor of Classics at Purdue University, Keith Dickson has also written widely about Homer, most recently an article for Arethusa on Kalkhas and Nestor in the first book of the Iliad. For the next two years he will be teaching in Beijing, China.

One of folklorist Eric Montenyohl's chief interests is represented here in his discussion of strategies for textualization of oral traditions, a topic that he is pursuing in a book-length manuscript. Having received a Ph.D from Indiana University, he now teaches at the University of Southwestern Louisiana.

James Pearce, Professor of Classical Studies at Trinity University in San Antonio, maintains research interests in a variety of Greek authors, especially Homer and Theocritus.

Having recently received his doctorate from Duke University, Raymond Person has two books in press, the latter of which brings sociolinguistic analysis to bear on the Old Testament Book of Job.

William Sale, Professor Emeritus of Classics at Washington University, has written extensively on the Homeric poems, with particular relation to their formulaic structure. His most recent articles appear in Transactions of the American Philological Association and Greek, Roman and Byzantine Studies.

A member of the Englisches Seminar and Sonderforschungsbereich on Orality and Literacy at the Universität Freiburg, Ursula Schaefer has published many influential works, among them Vokalität: Atlenglische Dichtung zwischen Mündlichkeit und Schriftlichkeit (1992).
